

(DREW TO HIS WIFE)

Dear Lenore,

It has been one week today since we started the new project of collecting blood for the American Red Cross. It seems ages ago. So many things seem to have taken place that it does not seem possible that only seven days have elapsed.

We have a full time staff of 12 people: 2 doctors, 4 nurses, 2 technicians, one bookkeeper, a secretary, 1 shipping clerk and 1 handy man.

The bleedings are done from 1 to 8 P. M. daily on Tuesday through Friday, from noon to 8 P.M. on Saturday and from 10 A. M. to 3 P. M. on Sunday. For every one but the secretary, Monday is a day of rest.

I, as usual, have no special hours and no particular day of rest.

At present we are bleeding 60 donors a day. At the end of about 2 weeks we shall be doing 100 a day and try to work out the details of such a system on this level of activity. To date the whole thing has worked very well with no hitches of any importance. The doctors are Dr. Earle Taylor, whom you know and Dr. Darrell Shaw, recently Resident in Surgery at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital in Boston. The nurses are Mrs. Clark, formerly Miss Templeman of the operating room staff, who lost her job in the hospital when she married Dr. David Clark, one of the Junior Residents in Surgery. You may remember him. Miss Elliot is the nurse who came to assist Miss Stoddard when the work in the bank grew very heavy during the "Plasma for Britain" project. Mrs. Bradshaw is a former operating room nurse who went with the American Ambulance Unit to Finland, got chased out of there by the Russians, - landed in Norway just in time to be run out by the Germans, - got over into France just before it fell and had to make a quick exit to England, only to be bombed out of the hospital they had been assigned to almost at the very onset of the Luftwaffe on London. Finally they decided to wall it a day and come home. The fourth nurse is from the Memorial Hospital and was chosen as probably the best of the lot there. So you see we have a grand crew and this in part explains why we have had so little trouble. I brought the other girls up from my office at the academy. Each one, in addition to the duties which she is assigned in the bank, can take dictation at a rapid pace and is an expert stenographer of at least five years experience.

Scudder, of course, was very hurt when the job which he has felt that he was creating for himself was not offered to him. I truthfully felt very badly for him. There is no doubt about his knowledge of the subject and his deep interest in it, but he has antagonized so many people that his nomination for the job became almost an impossibility. I tried to save some of his face by adding his name to my report to the Board of Medical Control. I feel that I have now paid back in work and favors any debt I might have owed as a result of his early kindnesses to me here in New York. Our relationship will never be entirely cordial for there is enough of the Nietzschean about him to feel that "man is not to be surpassed" and he will not ever take kindly to the idea that I started under him and gradually took over. Tonight he is leaving for a trip to Florida and a well earned vacation. D. V. looks a little worn and haggard. She too has felt the coldness of the procedures and has worked like a trojan beside John throughout this project. I wish that it were possible to turn over to him this job. No one will hear of it so I am grooming Earl Taylor as fast as I can.

Tonight we have signed the Report. I shall send you a copy. This whole medical report was written in ten days. I wrote every line of it in the original manuscript. Later it was edited, rearranged and modified in certain passages by other members of the Association, but for me, to date this marks my greatest single writing effort. I am very happy to have it behind me. I believe that it is a good piece of work and will in years to come prove of greater value to all concerned than any thing I might have done at Howard during the period just being brought to a close. I think that I was wise to come.

For you, I know, it has been a disappointing period. Our separation has caused us to miss much that we may have shared together. For this I am sorry. Many of the days and nights have been lonely here for me. I know that they were much more lonely for you, but from times immemorial, men who have beat out new paths into unknown regions have had to strike out alone, leaving all that was dear behind. These have been new paths that I have been treading, Lenore, as new as the uncharted seas that the early sailors defied, as strange as the new lands early explorers mapped while good wives waited in fear and loneliness lest the wandering ones failed to return. Yet, it has always been true, that where one man dared to go, others would follow, and these, the ones who followed after, often brought their whole families along and knew more joy than those who first came that way, and some of those who came along later, were the children of those who had gone before, and their joys were a recompense to those who had gone ahead, the lonely ones. Maybe Bebe will some day live and laugh and work under conditions which will make you glad that during long, apparently useless days you pushed back the tears and lived alone while I-I found new places in which to grow.

I know that you think that all of this is just a little bit heroic, sometimes I do too, and laugh at myself. But most of the time I am deadly serious about it, as though I had nothing to do with it but simply carried out commands given me by some inner force which never wants to play. I should play more, we should play more, not separately, but together. Sometimes, I forget that no woman is all woman, totally grown up and self-sufficient, but that each in a large measure is a little girl who needs the loving, the understanding, the tolerance and even guidance that little girls need. Sometimes, you forget that all men are just little boys grown up and playing at bigger games, that they too need understanding, encouragement and help even when they seem to be going along at a great pace. We both forget at times that the essence of life lies in making two blades of grass grow where one grew before, in bringing a smile where there was a tear, in giving and sharing as much as we can.

There is much work that we may do together in the future, there is much joy that I know we will share, but even though we are apart there is no cause for disunity in heart or spirit or mind - there need not be any lack of common purpose. I love you very much, Lenore. With you or away from you I love you just the same. Withal, I hope that we soon shall be together.

Devotedly,

C. Curtis
