

Quandry re choice of college

Dear Dad,

Today I was challenged for position but, despite the wind, maintained an advantage and came through 6-6, 6-4.

Last Saturday we played M.I.T. freshmen. I was unable to play from the weakness of my foot, muscles state. I am not yet in the fine condition I was before the attack ^{of my muscles}, brief tho' it was. Wednesday we played New Hampton, I won both singles + doubles with Ed, the first 6-3, 6-1, the second 6-4, 6-0.

I have abandoned study in favor of reading and drinking milk each night with graham crackers. The combinations according to all sane precepts, ought to put weight on my ribs, I'm but every day in every way I'm getting gaunter and gaunter.

I am in a quandary about college. I only wish you were here to talk to; I know you could help me. Indeed, I have half a mind to phone, but I will try to write instead.

When I think of going to Williams I sometimes wonder. The fellows there are all fine chaps, as I saw when I was there, and the college life must be great, but what else is there. In one visit of 3 days I saw almost all the college has to offer. Way off from any center of civilization, the school doesn't seem to offer enough recompense in the way of cultural curriculum to warrant a 4 year sequestered life. The rules are little ~~to~~ more free than Exeter, with chapel, no cars til you're a junior, required courses etc.

Princeton on the otherhand offers the advantages of college life + approach to civilization; and yet Princeton strikes no string within me now does it seem to offer the chance for individuality. In other words, Princeton, or Yale, produces a type.

yet this is not true at Harvard.
There, undoubtably, is the most admirably professed University, offering the broadest ~~branch~~ scope of curriculum.

There is freedom of individual activities as well as mental development, there the most perfect opportunity to develop what few talents I flatter myself that I possess. There too is cultured Boston; and yet at Harvard I lose the college tradition, campus life, and probably a great deal of the close intercourse of a small college.

You have been to college and are, of all people, the best able to advise me, knowing me as you do and being able to judge things in their real value. What price intellectual freedom or what price college life?
I wish I knew.

I have asked some of ~~the~~ ^{my} closest friends of the faculty. One, lately out of Harvard, a man whose outlook on life, whose mental attainments, and whose judgement I respect and admire, has strongly urged Harvard on me, flattering ~~my~~ me by saying that I, with what accomplishments are mine, and with my abilities, would feel confined and bound in at a place like Williams; he tempts me with visions of the tutorial system.

I have therefore made out an application just in case — but I need the two sheets detailing board results which you have, or which you sent to Princeton. Please let me know immediately if you have them, and if so please forward.

There is, moreover, two other considerations, one pro, one con, re Harvard. If I attend Harvard Business School as a post graduate course, I will probably be very fed up on Boston and Cambridge if I spent my under-graduate course there too. On the other hand, if I try for a Rhodes scholarship, and it looks now as if I might, and should I be fortunate enough to get one, Harvard would offer me the best background from which to approach England.

In short, I am in a quandary. If I knew more people I liked, Princeton would appeal, but no soap, so I guess that's out. Harvard or Williams, big college or small, education and development or college life, broad horizon or happy cloister, culture or contact, which shall it be? As I said, if I could only talk to you I feel sure I could settle it.

My knee has returned somewhat. I lack confidence on my strokes. My footwork is weak, as is my net play. In general, however, my play is improving.

I think I sent a whole boxful of socks about 3 weeks ago containing many pairs of tennis socks. Did they come?

Awaiting to hear from,
with lots and lots of love, Henry

P.S. Williams has a good library.
